There must be enough information to show the need for a rights restriction. There is a place to record the consent of the person, as well as the people who support them. Restriction type Period review

Timeline:

Date of next review:

Specific individualized and assessed need: A rights restriction must be based on a full review of the person and their unique needs. As a reminder, the restriction cannot be a result of a restriction to someone else, or to make things easier for staff.

Positive and less intrusive intervention methods and supports used prior to the proposed restriction: Positive interventions observe, teach, and reinforce the behavior you want while discouraging the behavior you don't want. Less intrusive interventions protect the person's rights and well-being using the least restrictive method.

Clear description of how the restriction is proportionate to the assessed need: Restrictions must balance the rights of the person with their health and safety and the health and safety of the community. As the risk goes down or up, the restriction should change to match the need.

Outline assurances that interventions and supports will cause no harm to the individual: The restriction should support the person's well-being. It should not cause undue pain, injury, or distress to the person. Restrictions should not be used as a punishment.

Outline the data collection method(s) and timeline(s) to measure the ongoing effectiveness of the restriction: Describe how data will be taken on how the restriction is working. List the dates the restriction will be looked at with the support team to make sure it is still needed.

Describe how informed consent was reached: Outline the way you got the informed consent of the person. If the informed consent discussion was noted on a different form, add key details here. Here are links to an informed consent form and the guidance document you can use.

Consent

Note: If the person does not agree, teams should start the process over to find common ground. Reach out to the DSPD community inclusion team at communityinclusionteam@utah.gov for help and resources, if needed.

Signatures

By signing, all participants have read, understood, and agreed to the outlined terms of the rights restriction for the person. This agreement is made while considering the person’s needs and possible impact of the restriction on their rights. The restriction is put in place because less intrusive measures have not worked. The participants agree that this decision is in the best interest of the person’s health, safety, and well-being. The person may remove their consent or ask to have the restriction reviewed at any time.
